

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

5 A congestive heart failure monitor has an impedance measuring unit that measures the impedance between at least two electrodes implanted in a patient, to use a detected change of the measured impedance as an indication of a change in the left atrium volume. Any analyzing unit analyzes the measured impedance and detects insipient congestive heart failure dependent on a quotient of a maximum value of the measured impedance and a minimum value of the measured impedance during a cardiac cycle.